Don't pine for the cheat

Q. I've been communicating with a guy online on and off for almost two years and he's disappeared again after saying he wanted to see if there was something between us. Will he get in contact with me in the future or has he gone for good?

No Idea, Sinnamon Park

A. This man is a liar and he has been caught out by his wife who threatened to leave him and make merry hell over the custody of their two children. He is gone and you will be all the better for it. On the man front you have a lovely man coming through to you next December. He will be honest, open and not married!

Work is a drag

Q. I am currently in a position in my life where my job is unfulfilling and the company management is unco-operative. I need a change but I have no idea what to do as my trust has been destroyed by those I have worked with. I am lost on every level and feel very uncertain as to what the future holds and would appreciate some guidance. I work full-time and love to work and need to for financial reasons as well as for the satisfying aspect of doing something worthwhile. In the past I have been on stress leave and do not want to end up the same way again (same very large organisation). I was born in 1948 so this could be a bit of a stumbling block as far as seeking work elsewhere but I am restless, frustrated and bored with things on a professional and personal level at present.

Frustrated, Brisbane

A. What concerns me most about your story is that you seem locked in your mindset and it's holding you back. You are naturally open and embracing but I feel you need to take this into your work environment. I feel that you need to let go of what you don't want and start to focus on what you do want. For example, if you do not want to work in a large organisation again, then look for a small-to-medium one to approach. I feel your fear around your age is also holding you back. I feel that when you put yourself into the marketplace you will find that it will take four months to find your next employment but the wait will be worth it. Don't shy away from looking at the same or similar position in another company as I feel your next opportunity will put more value on your experience and give you the chance to add further to your skills in other areas as well.

No blarney

Q. I am incredibly fortunate to have a loving family, great friends, and a job that I enjoy. All that is missing is someone to share it with. Do you see this kind of happiness in my future?

Kate, Taringa

A. Yes, you will find someone to share it with but it is taking a while because the actual person you are meant to be with is not yet on Australian soil! My guide is telling me that you will meet a wonderful, funny, intelligent and wacky IT guy who is Irish and he will be in Australia due to work. It will be happy ever after!
